Link random letters together to form words and clear as many rows as you can! By Ken Michaels, Guest Writer In Shakespeare's play "Hamlet," Polonius inquires of the prince, "What do you read, my lord?" Not at all pleased with what he's reading, Hamlet replies, "Words, words, words."1 I have previously described the communication model in which a sender encodes a message and then sends it via some channel (or medium) to a receiver, who decodes the message and, ideally, understands what was sent. Surely the most common way of encoding a message is in choosing the most appropriate words for the listener or reader. In Hamlet's case, he so disliked what he read that he described it elementally, as mere words, rather than a message. So I thought I'd devote a little ink to words themselves. "Nym" Words Have Specific Meaning Words ending in nym describe classes of words. Some of the more frequently used nym words are synonym (means the same as); antonym (means the opposite of); homonym (has the same sound as); and acronym (a word derived from the first letters of a more complex term, such as SCUBA or AIDS). Homo means "same," and hetero means "different." Therefore, if there are homonyms, it stands to reason that there are also heteronyms. While homonyms have the same sound but different spellings (like pair and pear), heteronyms are spelled the same but have different meanings and, often, pronunciation: a person who sews is a sewer, but a repository for waste products is a sewer. Sewer, then, is a heteronym. But the lexicon of nym words by no means ends here. One of the websites I visited recently2 lists no fewer than 26 nym words, many of which are pretty arcane and of interest to relatively few. Some are downright amusing. Do we really need a word to mean another word composed of two identical parts? If so, then tata, pawpaw, yo-yo, and bye-bye are tautonyms. A couple of weeks back, my son asked me what is meant by a metonym. I didn't know, so we looked it up. In retrospect, I ought to have been able to logic it out, as "meta" means change. A metonym is a word that designates something by a word that is associated with it. For example, Hollywood is a metonym used to mean the U.S. motion picture industry, while the Crown refers to royalty, and the bottle refers to alcohol. My use of the expression "a little ink" a couple of paragraphs back is also a metonym for written communication, even when no actual ink or writing on paper is involved. The point of all of this has to do with precision in the use of our language. It will do me no good to encode a message using a word like metonym, or heteronym, or tautonym, unless I'm certain that my listeners (or readers) are familiar with its meaning. Either that, or I'm prepared to add the definition for their benefit, in which case I might have just used the definition in the first place. Still, learning the proper use of words, however arcane, can be useful, and if you like words themselves, even fun. What's Your Idiolect? In his book "The Half-Life of Facts: Why Everything We Know Has an Expiration Date," Samuel Arbesman3 discusses the changes in language that occur over time, and the two camps that see this phenomenon differently. He explains prescriptive grammarians as those who focus on the way words ought to be used, and descriptive grammarians as those who are more concerned with the way they actually are used. Arbesman asserts that every individual develops his or her own set of rules about how to use words, and that all of us—you, me, and everybody else—have our own personal idiolect. This delightful term describes our unique language and speech pattern, as determined by what we learned when we were young, as well as by who's around us, and includes our grammar, vocabulary, pronunciation of words, and even our accent. There's an important lesson here. If we're really going to communicate effectively, we need to be mindful that every time we encode a message, someone whose idiolect is significantly different from our own may very possibly decode it in such a way as to get a different message entirely. So it pays to be careful about our choice of words; is it really a message, or simply "words, words, words"? © 2013 Ken Michaels. All rights reserved. As anyone who has ever learned a language knows, translation between languages is difficult. Words that don't have a direct equivalent in another language are often considered "untranslatable." While these words often get lost in translation, they can have fun, strange, or beautiful meanings, making them worth learning. Here are 25 of our favorite untranslatable words from other languages. Korean (n) The art of gauging the mood of others, reading the situation, and reacting appropriately. Don't be that friend who doesn't have nunchi. Greek (v) Doing something with soul, creativity, or love; when you put something of yourself into your work. If you're working on something special, add your personal touch to it. Indonesian (n) A lame joke that is so poorly delivered, you can't help but laugh. When someone tells a joke that is so bad, that it's actually pretty funny. Swedish (n) The glistening, roadlike reflection the moon makes on water. Now you know a word that describes that beautiful view in a poetic way. Inuit (n) The feeling of anticipation when waiting for someone and often going outside to check for them. This word perfectly sums of that feeling when you're waiting for your friend to come pick you up or you're waiting for a package to be delivered. German (n) An intense desire to travel; longing far off places you've never been. Warning, seeing all your friends' traveling pictures may trigger fernweh. Tagalog (n) The sudden feeling of butterflies, shivers down the spine or blushing as one encounters something romantic. This word flawlessly describes the moment your crush first looks at you, when you first hold hands with someone you're attracted to, or even when you watch a romantic scene in a movie. Tagán (n) The special look between two people, each hoping the other person would start something they both desire, but both are unwilling to initiate. That moment when you both are craving for junk food, but you're trying to be healthy and waiting for the other person to suggest it first. Czech (n) A person who is uncouth yet deeply in love with life and proves life is worth living. This person finds beauty in everything and may speak senselessly. Dutch (n) A sense of joy or pleasure before a fun event. Yes, we're all eagerly anticipating the big party this weekend too. Mandarin (n) A friendship bonding two girls for eternity as kindred sisters. Ever seen a long lasting and strong bond between two women who are super close? This is the word for women friends for life. French (n) The happiness of reuniting with someone after a long time of being apart. Reunited and it feels so good. This goes to all the people who scream with joy when they see their friends again after a long separation. Chinese (n) A sense of complete and perfect accomplishment. Here's a word for when you feel absolutely proud of your best work and you can't make it any better because it's that good. Greek (n) A group of friends who regularly come together to enjoy each other's company, to share life experiences, their philosophies, and ideas. Building long-lasting friendships that also enrich your quality of life is good for the soul. This type of friendship will make you feel like your skin is clear and the sun is always shining. Spanish (n) Time spent at the table conversing and relaxing with people after eating together. The best conversations are the ones right after eating tasty food with good company. Swedish (n) Just the right amount. Not too little, not too much. Now, that's a motto we can get behind. Georgian (n) That feeling when you can't stop eating because everything tastes so delicious. We've all accidentally been there when our stomach tells us no, but our tastes buds are screaming yes. Japanese (n) When sunlight filters through the leaves of trees. We can gaze at this spectacle for hours. Sanskrit (n) The pleasure that comes from delighting in other people's well-being. Mudita describes the joy you experience when others around you are happy. The opposite of this word is schadenfreude. Tshiluba (n) A person who is ready to forgive any wrongdoing for the first time, tolerate it a second time, but never the third time. Linguists consider this the most difficult word to translate. German (n) A place you call "home" because it fulfills a sense of belonging and safety creating a deep emotional connection to the location. Heimat can be a warm and loving place where you lived the longest, where your family is, or wherever makes you feel at home. Finnish (n) Extraordinary strength and persistent determination to continue overcoming adversity. Finnish history and culture show that during challenging moments that seem impossible to handle an attitude of sisu will help you endure it to the end. Swedish (n) The restless feeling before a journey begins; a tangle of anxiety and anticipation. Ever felt your traveling heart race after booking a plane ticket because you were scared and excited at the same time? Resfeber will help explain that nervous energy you're experiencing. German (n) The celebratory mood you get when it's the end of the working day. Cheers! It's time for the getting off work dance. Norwegian (n) The electric euphoria one experiences at the beginning of falling in love. Ever been lovestruck? This word will melt your heart.
